5 Signs Your GLP-1 Diet Is Working Against You

The medication is doing its job — but if any of these sound familiar, your nutrition isn't supporting it. Recognising the signs early separates people who get lasting results from people who lose weight and feel worse doing it.

1 You're losing weight but getting weaker

Without adequate protein and resistance training, a significant portion of weight lost on a GLP-1 comes from muscle, not fat. That's the weight you don't want to lose — it directly affects your strength, metabolism and long-term results.

2 Your hair is visibly thinning or shedding more than usual

Diffuse shedding (telogen effluvium) is a documented response to rapid weight loss and under-fuelling. It typically appears 2–3 months in and is compounded by low protein, iron and zinc. It's temporary and reversible — but only if the nutritional causes are addressed.

3 Your energy crashes even though you're eating less

Less food means a smaller margin for error. If total intake drops too low or the wrong macros are being cut, your body has less fuel for daily activity, training and recovery. Eating less and eating smarter are two very different outcomes.

4 You feel nauseous after most meals

GLP-1s slow gastric emptying — food sits in your stomach longer. High-fat, greasy or large meals are the most common trigger. This isn't the medication failing, it's a food structure problem. The right meal composition makes a significant difference to how you feel daily.

5 The weight loss has slowed or stopped despite still taking the medication

A plateau on a GLP-1 is almost always a nutrition issue, not a medication issue. Without a structured approach to calories and macros, it's easy to under-eat on some days and unknowingly compensate on others — making results inconsistent and unpredictable.
